Adam's Latin Grammar, abridged and arranged in a Course of Practical Lessons, adapted to the Capacity of young Learners. By William Russell. 18mo. pp. 240. Appendix 40. New Haven. A. H. Maltby and Co.

The principal improvements, which the author professes to have introduced into this abridgment, are a more natural and lucid arrangement, frequent recapitulation of the important parts, explanations of all difficult terms, and an attempt throughout the work to bring the whole into an analytical method. In some of these things he has succeeded; in others he has driven his passion for simplifying a little too far. There are cases in which a formal explanation only confuses the idea of a thing to be explained; and it is a fruitless task in the study of grammar especially, to endeavor to make a child understand everything as he proceeds. To obtain the first rudiments of grammar is after all an effort of memory, and this faculty is the main thing to be considered in constructing an elementary treatise. Simplicity and a clear arrangement are the points chiefly to be kept in view, and in these particulars this abridgment seems to be an improvement on the larger work, and to be well fitted for the young pupil at his first entrance on the study of the Latin language. It is recommended by Professors Kingsley and Goodrich of Yale College.

A Grammar of Composition, including a Practical Review of the Principles of Rhetoric, a Series of Exercises in Rhetorical Analysis, and six Introductory Courses of Composition. 12mo. pp. 150. New Haven. A. H. Maltby and Co.

Mr Russell, the author of the above abridgment, is also the author of this compend. It is perspicuous, and particularly designed for academies and schools of the higher order. It is highly recommended by Mr Goodrich, Professor of Rhetoric and Oratory in Yale College. The author mentions a second part on Declamation, which we have not seen.

Sixth Report of the Board of Directors of the Presbyterian Education Society, presented at the Annual Meeting, May 13, 1824. 8vo. pp. 56. New York. J. Seymour.

Elements of Latin Prosody and Metre, compiled from the best Authorities, together with a Synopsis of Poetic Licenses occurring in the Versification of Virgil, a Metrical Index to the Lyric Composition of Horace, and the Scanning of the Mixed Trimeter and Dimeter Iambics of the latter Poet. By Charles Anthon, Adjunct Professor of Languages in Columbia College, New York. 12mo. pp. 120. New York. T. and J. Swords.

Mr Anthon speaks of his purpose and labors as follows. 'It was originally intended by the compiler to publish merely an improved edition of the Latin Prosody of Alvarez. Upon reflection, however, this plan was abandoned, as being liable to many objections, and the one which has been followed in the present instance was adopted in its stead. The metrical rules of Alvarez, occasionally altered, wherever such alteration seemed necessary, are first given, and the principles concisely stated in them are next presented more in detail and in an English garb.' This was a judicious decision. There was no harm in retaining the Latin rules of Alvarez, because they occupy a comparatively small space, and are really comprehensive in their matter, however clumsy in their manner. But to have published the Latin rules without the explanations in English would have been conferring a meagre benefit on the student. The old traditionary mode of teaching Latin through the medium of Latin rules is a trammel, which it is quite time to throw off. There would be just as much propriety in studying chemistry, mineralogy, architecture, or any other science or art in the Latin language before it has been learnt, as in resorting to this method of studying the principles of the language itself. To this little treatise on Latin Prosody the author has communicated much value, by his numerous quotations from the poets, to illustrate by a full example every rule and every exception. They will thus be impressed more deeply on the mind. Besides Alvarez's work, he acknowledges himself indebted, in forming this compilation, to Dr Cary's Latin Prosody, the Port Royal Latin Grammar, and Gesner's Thesaurus.

LAW.

A Dissertation on the Nature and Extent of the Jurisdiction of the Courts of the United States, being a Valedictory Address delivered to the Students of the Law Academy of Philadelphia, at the Close of the Academical Year, on the 22d April, 1824. By Peter S. Duponceau, LL. D. Provost of the Academy. To which are added, a Brief Sketch of the National Judiciary Powers exercised in the United States prior to the Adoption of the present Federal Constitution. By Thomas Sergeant, Esq. Vice Provost. And the Author's Discourse on Legal Education, delivered at the opening of the Law Academy, in February, 1821. With an Appendix and Notes. 8vo. Philadelphia.

The Case of Gibbons against Ogden, heard and determined in the Supreme Court of the United States, February Term, 1824, on Appeal from the Court of Errors in the State of New York, and involving the Constitutionality of the Laws of that State, granting to Livingston and Fulton the exclusive Navigation of its Waters by Steam Boats. Reported by Henry Wheaton. 8vo. pp. 244. New York. R. Donaldson.

The arguments before the Supreme Court in the celebrated Steam Boat case are all reported at full length in this volume, together with the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall, and the concurrent opinion of Judge Johnson. The arguments are by Messrs Webster and Wirt for the appellant, and Messrs Oakley and Emmett for the respondent, and they embrace a most profound and elaborate discussion of the great question concerning national and state sovereignty. The report of this case is published in anticipation of Mr Wheaton's annual volume, for reasons stated in the advertisement as follows.

'The editor has been induced to prepare the following case for publication in a pamphlet form, on account of the peculiar interest attending it, and the importance of the principles of constitutional law involved in its determination. A large portion of the public, for whom the adjudications of the Supreme Court, upon questions of private or local jurisprudence, can have no attractions, is deeply interested in the more important subjects, which are occasionally discussed in this high tribunal. It has, therefore, been thought, that a separate report of this case would be acceptable, not only to the profession, but to all who take an interest in discussions so closely connected with the fundamental principles of our national government. This class of causes has recently increased in number and importance; and though the editor cannot pretend to do justice to the learning and eloquence of the eminent individuals engaged in them, yet, should this attempt be approved, he may hereafter endeavor to present to the public a separate account of the decisions of the court upon questions of constitutional law, in anticipation of the annual publication of reports. The determination of the important question of the validity of the state bankrupt or insolvent laws, which was argued at the last term, and the final decision of which is postponed to the next, will probably give another occasion for a similar publication.'

These views and resolutions of the editor are good, and it is to be hoped he will be encouraged by the approbation and patronage of the public to carry them into execution. The knowledge thus diffused will have a strong influence, both in enlightening and consolidating public opinion on subjects of the greatest importance.

A Digest of the Cases Reported in the Constitutional Court of South Carolina. By a Member of the Charleston Bar.

A General Arrangement and Digest of American Law. By Nathan Dane, LL. D. Vol. IV. Cummings, Hilliard and Co.

This is the largest and most elaborate work on law hitherto undertaken in this country, being, as the title imports, a digest of the law in all its branches, comprising short notices of all the reported cases, and references to all the treatises, both English and American, as far as they are generally applicable in our practice; thus constituting an epitome of a lawyer's library. It may be considered the fruits of the labor of the author's life, and that a long one, for he is at an advanced age, having devoted the last fifteen or sixteen years to it exclusively, and, during the preceding twenty or thirty years, collected and arranged such materials for it, as occurred to him in his attendance on different courts in the course of an extensive practice, and the study and investigations to which his practice necessarily led him. The sale of such a work in the United States can afford no adequate compensation for the author's labor, whose better reward is the consciousness of having rendered the public an important service, and the assurance that the public is not insensible of its obligations to him. The improvement of our laws and their administration, and our advances in all sciences and arts, depend upon the labors of men who thus, quietly in their retirement, devote their days and nights for successive years to the steady and indefatigable pursuit of their chosen objects, never diverted by amusements or a love of ease, nor discouraged, from not hearing any cheering expression of the public opinion.

The work is comprised in eight volumes, four of which are published, and three others are now in the press. The contents of the first seven volumes are distributed into two hundred and twenty eight chapters, divided into articles, and these again into short sections, numbered, for reference, whereby a subject may be more easily and conveniently found from the index, than if the references were only to volumes and pages. The eighth volume is intended to consist of a copious index to the others.

The difficulty of making a simple, scientific arrangement of the different branches of the law, in a digest or general treatise, has been a subject of frequent remark. The plan of Sir Matthew Hale, which was adopted by Blackstone in his Commentaries, has been considered defective, and it is very questionable whether any other will be substituted for it, that will be entirely satisfactory. The difficulty of making any perfect division of this science arises partly from the circumstance, that any general system must comprehend remedies as well as rights, and an order the most natural and perspicuous in treating of actions, writs, pleadings, evidence, and modes of proceeding, is not necessarily the best adapted to the rights and obligations, which are the foundation of these proceedings, and no plan would probably save the author from frequent repetitions and apparent digressions.

To escape from this difficulty in some degree, the authors of digests and abridgments have resorted to an alphabetical or arbitrary arrangement of titles. But this plan, or rather substitute for a plan, does not remedy the difficulty altogether, for a question still recurs as to the number of titles to be chosen, and arranged in alphabetical order, some choosing more, others fewer; and as to the subjects to be comprehended under each title, the same subject being often found under different titles in the different abridgments. This order does not therefore always very easily and directly present one, who consults the book, with what he is searching after, and all the uses and advantages of such an order are obtained in a full alphabetical index. Accordingly, though Mr Dane has in part adopted the alphabetical arrangement, he has been judicious in not confining himself to it strictly, and in deviating from it wherever subjects connected with each other might be thus brought together, which must otherwise have been separated, since the index will afford all the facility in consulting the work, which would have been derived from a strict adherence to an alphabetical order of subjects.

We propose hereafter, when the whole work is published, to notice it in a more particular manner.

A Sketch of the Condition of the Science of the Law in the United States, read before the Kentucky Institute. By Charles Humphreys, Esq.

In the course of this Address Mr Humphreys makes the following remarks. 'The body of law, recognised as operative in each state, is of considerable extent ; consisting of the constitution of the United States, national law, statutes of Congress, adjudication of the Supreme Court, common law, statute law of the particular state, and state judicial decisions. All these perhaps might be embraced in one work ; but owing to the facility and frequency of legislation, I very much incline to the opinion, that it is better to exhibit them in distinct codes ; the law of nations in one, the common law in a second, the law of the Union in a third, the local statutes in a fourth, and a digest of judicial decisions in a fifth, containing necessary references from one to another throughout. But in whatever form law is presented to the public, it must occupy much space. An imperfect conception can be formed of its magnitude by adverting to the progress of the production of law books. In Kentucky, there have issued, independently of the forty two little annual volumes of acts of assembly, eleven volumes of digested statutes, six volumes of revisions and compendiums, and thirteen volumes of reports, besides some smaller works.'

The Vaccine Inquirer, or Miscellaneous Collections relative to Vaccination. Edited by Gideon B. Smith. No. V. Baltimore.

In the beginning of the year 1822, a periodical work with this title was commenced in Baltimore, conducted by a Society of Physicians, and designed to make the public acquainted with the nature, principles, and practice of vaccination. It continued to the fourth number, when it was suspended. The present number is a revival of the same work. It contains Dr James Smith's Letter to Mr Clay during the last session of Congress, on the subject of vaccination, his Memorial to Congress on the same subject, and the Report of the committee appointed to take the memorial into consideration. This report is accompanied by a bill to encourage vaccination favorable to the views of the memorialist. This bill was not acted on at the time, but will probably be brought forward during the next session. Dr Smith served as vaccine agent for the United States, by the appointment of the President, for ten years during the existence of the old law. His letter to Mr Clay, in the present number of the Inquirer, throws new light on the mysterious affair, which took place at Tarborough three years ago in the transmission of the vaccine virus, and which was brought to the notice of Congress the winter following. Vaccination was first practised in England by Dr Jenner, its discoverer, May 14, 1796. It was introduced into Boston by Dr Waterhouse, July 2, 1800; and into Baltimore by Dr Smith, May 1, 1801.

The Baltimore Vaccine Catechism, or a few of the most Important Questions relative to Vaccination answered. By James Smith, late Agent of Vaccination for the United States. Baltimore. J. D. Toy.

The motto of this little manual should be multum in parvo. It presents, in as compressed a form as possible, a simple and practical account of the theory, operation, and benefits of vaccination. From the long experience of Dr Smith, from his very extensive practice for many years as United States agent, and from the ardor with which he has studied and pursued this particular branch of the profession, it is reasonable to suppose, that this little treatise contains important results and valuable hints. Of its scientific merits we pretend not to judge. Dr Smith has adopted a mode of practice different from that of most of the faculty. Its efficacy and utility he has tested by a very thorough experience, and he deems it to possess many advantages over any other method.

An Oration delivered at Quincy, on the 5th of July, 1824. By George Washington Adams. 8vo. pp. 24. E. Lincoln. Boston.

In his choice of a subject, and mode of treating it, Mr Adams has been much more successful, than is common with our anniversary orators. He had a purpose in view, and method in pursuing it, which are important characteristics in any performance, but which most of our orators on the national festival seem to forget in the vehemence of their declamation, and the dazzling flame of their metaphors. Mr Adams sketches a rapid and discriminating outline of the early history of this country and draws out as he goes along the leading causes, which gradually operated in making us a distinct people, and building us up into a nation. His remarks evince a wide extent of reading in American history, and often discover a compass of thought and philosophical reflection by no means common to all that read. In the following extract the author is speaking of the early settlers of New England.

‘Accustomed to judge for themselves in matters of theology, they began to feel it as their right to judge in those of government. Acknowledging themselves to be English subjects, they drew nice distinctions in defining that subjection in order that it might not prejudice their privileges. With no nobility to check the growth of equal systems; no hierarchy to hold out a lure to clerical ambition, or to sustain royal pretensions to supremacy in religion; no courts supported by the forfeitures decreed by their own judges; they grew up in the enjoyment of republican rights. They constituted a republic under the jurisdiction of a magistrate, too distant to govern them effectively, and too profoundly ignorant of their importance to straiten around them the cords of sovereignty. Their governor, chosen by themselves, was annually removable under the earlier plans of administration, and though afterwards lost, this right of choosing their own rulers had been exercised and was remembered. Their immediate executive was elective, and thus responsible to them. Indeed, the wise and virtuous men, who took the lead in their affairs, encouraged the republican immunities of the people, and supported the established charter rule of annual elections, from their own conviction of its value; sensible

“That nobler is a limited command,
Given by the love of all your native land,
Than a successive title, long and dark,
Drawn from the mouldy robes of Noah’s ark.”

To annual elections they soon added representation, and improved on the practice of the mother country by equalising the rule. The right of being represented was not granted by the first charters, but it was adopted shortly after their arrival, and in various periods of our history its value has been ascertained.’

The orator proceeds to detail with accuracy and spirit the primary causes of the revolution, which established our independence. He sketches, with a lively and judicious pencil, the characters of Hancock, Samuel Adams, and Quincy, and pays a just tribute to the memory of these early and firm patriots. The style of this oration is in its prevailing features well formed and expressive. Its faults are occasional negligence, and now and then a too bountiful flow of youthful exuberance, as well in the language as the thought.

This Report, and the documents appended to it, afford most flattering testimonies of the success of the Institution, to which humanity has already been so much indebted. Among the specimens of the pupils' improvements are some of a very remarkable character, which, at the same time they prove to what an astonishing degree the mind of the deaf and dumb may be cultivated, reflect much credit on the diligence and skill of Mr Gallaudet and his associate instructors. The whole number of pupils, who have entered the Asylum since its establishment in 1817, has been 128; of these 66 had left, and 62 were residents, at the time the present Report was made.
